The presented review contains a summary of the studies concerning the assessment of the individual risk of developing clinical symptoms associated with the administration of certain medicinal products, that could be responsible for severe adverse effects in patients. Significant differences in the adverse effects following administration of a given medicinal product between individuals are observed. Parameters such as age, gender, genetic predisposition, and lifestyle are crucial in determining the occurrence of a certain adverse effect. Physicians and pharmacists are, therefore, required to know the individual characteristics of each patient in order to determine the likelihood of developing a certain adverse effect.
