This is a technical question, but can be answered by a normal person, using general knowledge of encryption. My database hosts a big PHP project, and the code for the query processing is mixed PHP + SQL to store the data. There is SSL encryption for the whole system, but a lot of sensitive and private data is stored in the SQL Server itself. I'm using the Windows built-in SQL server which has native encryption capabilities on both the server and client side. I've worked on a number of systems where I'm not able to get the database to encrypt the data, because I need to define a custom file transfer protocol between the system and the server to ensure the data can be read and processed correctly (because it's end-to-end encrypted and the server has the data, but the file 3da54e8ca3
