President Donald Trump | Saul Loeb/Getty Images Trump says don't meddle in international affairs, but it may be too late for NATO The defense alliance 'has been badly damaged,' says former US secretary of state. President Donald Trump has spent years criticizing NATO for what he sees as its failing to stand up to Russia and failing to do enough to defend the U.S. He has also, up until now, at least been interested in only one of the alliance's core values: defense. But he's learning that an alliance built around mutual defense is so much more than that, and he's also learning that its internal disputes can become a nasty political fight. That's the message former Secretary of State Hillary Clinton, who also launched an impeachment inquiry against Trump, delivered Sunday when she published a think piece for NBC News. "Today," she wrote, "the Atlantic alliance is in more trouble than it has been in decades. NATO's attempt to integrate a new generation of leaders from Europe has been squandered. Its common defense is in decline, its political unity, if it ever existed, has evaporated." If NATO falls apart, Clinton wrote, "Russia's aggression in Ukraine is a warning of what happens when a revisionist state that wishes to restore the lost greatness of the Soviet Union – as President Vladimir Putin has openly said – is allowed to see its former Eastern European satellites gradually rejoin the West." Unlike Trump, she never said the U.S. should leave NATO, but she said the U.S. should spend more on defense, especially on "the people it supposedly protects: namely
