I've been thinking a lot about it and wondering... is software-development, on any scale, a good idea? Right now, I'm working as a 2D-artist (both game-art, non-game-art) in a small studio in The Netherlands. I'm doing some freelance work for major companies, mainly, but not only, in the AAA-industry. Sure, I've worked with the IT departments of some places and have a little bit of experience in their software-development, but what I really do is mostly: Translate conceptual ideas and concepts into the current tech at that time, with nice effects and "tweaks" for various platforms (games, websites and a few applications). Sometimes this is done at a rate of about one concept per day (though a few weeks more or less), but the rate is variable and it's pretty fine-tuned. If I can't decide if I should work on a concept or not, I'll probably just lay out things in Photoshop, make notes in comments and later follow up to the team who will make sure I'm doing the right direction for the project, and then back to Photoshop. I really enjoy this kind of projects and they give me a lot of satisfaction. However, what I have no experience in is the actual coding, implementation and QA. I can't really speak as a software-developer, and the only things I understand are some specific techniques and some production-tools for native (Linux/Mac) and web-development (like Php, CakePHP, and Javascript and the like). From what I can tell, I may be overestimating my knowledge and skills in software-development, and the reason I'm thinking in this direction is that it seems really easy to me, since I'm being "paid" for it. Is it a good idea, though? Or is it not? Is it a good idea, but it's actually a really hard thing to do, especially if bff6bb2d33
