At the launch event, we saw how the technology is being used to add intent to and power player run animations, tackles, headers, aerial duels, counter-attacks, shot blocks and more. We saw FIFA 22 use the HyperMotion Technology to power player run animations, tackles, headers, aerial duels, counter-attacks, shot blocks and more. The demo featured 15 goalkeepers of varying ability, including experienced England No. 1 Joe Hart; France's Hugo Lloris, Germany's Manuel Neuer, Italy's Gianluigi Buffon, Netherlands' Jasper Cillessen and world beater Gianluigi Buffon; promising new England No. 1 Alex McCarthy; former FIFA Women's World Player of the Year Nadine Angerer; and veteran Danish keeper Peter Schmeichel. Throughout the game, we saw a variety of players shift, keep and challenge the ball with nuanced animations. We were also treated to a look at the new and improved Player DNA, which has been redesigned to reflect player strengths and weaknesses, technical skills, speed and agility, game intelligence and more. READ MORE: FIFA 22 lineup, gameplay and more The new Player DNA includes new player traits such as strength, speed, agility and game intelligence, which determine how hard a player attacks the ball; explosiveness, which determines how fast a player can accelerate; reactions, which determines how fast a player can react; stamina, which determines how long a player can last in a match; and movement, which determines the size of a player's run zone. The Player DNA is informed by data gathered from the player performance test (PBT), which takes into account real-life tests of speed, strength, balance and agility, as well as data from the HyperMotion tech, which captures both physical and game intelligence factors. The new Player DNA can also be altered by using the player's coaches data. In our latest gameplay footage, we saw the game use the new Player DNA to power each player's unique attributes, including Hart's strength, agility and speed, the speed and agility of Lloris, Angerer's movement and explosiveness, and the stamina and intelligence of McCarthy. Similar to in previous games, we saw players receiving new skills, including Lloris receiving more control in his kicks and kicks/crosses, and the Brazilian midfielder Lucas Leiva receiving a new short pass to control from the
