What I have: a relay (connecting the output to the LED), a IR LED (same supply as the relay), a transistor (very low power one, 2N7003) My problem is that when the battery is low, the relay turns on (which turns on the LED), but the transistor is not able to withstand the load of the LED. Ideally, the transistor should be able to turn the LED on very slowly, while the relay can turn it on/off quickly (like a toggle). Transistor: BC548, resistor: 1k Ω , LED: 6V, 1A, yellow, led-12 A: Using a PWM signal from the microcontroller or the relay driver (and assuming your microcontroller is not also driving the relay) might be the best way to go. That way, you can control the relay to turn on and off, while the led can be dimmed so it doesn't go to 100% brightness right away. My preference would be for using a smaller transistor for the transistor in your circuit, such as the BC847. You can also try using one with higher saturation voltage to get more current from your transistor, but you'll likely have to adjust the Rds. If you're using a microcontroller, then you can just loop while the microcontroller 3a67dffeec
