Escherichia coli RNaseH2 is a single-subunit protein with both 5' to 3' exonuclease and endonuclease activities. We have previously shown that E. coli RNaseH2 has significant exoribonuclease activity with the highly conserved RNA binding motif located near its N terminus. Here we show that RNaseH2 efficiently degrades heterogeneous nuclear RNA and that the presence of this motif is critical for the degradation. Introduction of a His-tag into the RNaseH2 molecule affects the degradation of heterogeneous nuclear RNA by blocking the endonuclease activity of the helicase and causing inefficient degradation of the RNA. Our results suggest that the endonuclease activity of E. coli RNaseH2 is localized in the catalytic domain and that the protein may act as a multiple-turnover protein-like enzyme.Q: How to achieve a 'toggle' effect on a Polymer element that is contained in an element with disabled animations?
