The reality of this nesting contest is more difficult to guess than one would expect—this time of year a male cuttlefish has just emerged from the ocean, emerging from the humid soil to a warm, salty sea. The males are much bigger than the female goes for the weedy males that she thinks are the most aggressive males. In the meantime, the males, unaware of their inferior status, battle in an almost comical way, as they thrash about and stretch out their smaller bodies. Theirs is a simple contest, and the outcome will not be much of a surprise to an experienced observer. However, what is interesting about the cuttlefish's courtship is that there was no clear winner. Two years ago, Martin Müller from the University of Würzburg and colleagues showed that female segin to wander among the males, they start to sing. These songs are shallow and low-
