Outcomes of transcervical ligation of patent foramen ovale in patients with cryptogenic ischemic stroke: the Boston case-control study. We tested whether closure of patent foramen ovale (PFO) with percutaneous balloon dilation (PBD) in patients with cryptogenic stroke and PFO has a significant beneficial effect over medical treatment. We performed a 2-center, prospective case-control study of PBD patients matched 1:1 with a population of cryptogenic stroke patients with PFO that were medically treated. The primary outcome of the study was freedom from stroke recurrence. The secondary outcome was to test the hypothesis that PBD would have a significant effect on the secondary outcome of freedom from "major hemorrhagic events" (stroke, transient ischemic attack, or intracranial bleeding), which could potentially lead to improved functional outcome. After all procedures, the patients were treated with warfarin (target international normalized ratio [INR] 2-3) for at least 3 years. The end points of the study were recurrent stroke and any major hemorrhagic event. Follow-up was completed in 96% and 93% of the medically treated group and the PBD group, respectively. Two hundred eighty-three of 300 medically treated patients and 205 of 300 patients undergoing PBD were analyzed in the study. At the end of follow-up, 38 patients in the medically treated group had had a recurrent stroke and 37
